Coal in the Weser - 123/2a.

In Bremen Industrial Harbour the bottom of the Weser River is littered with many tons of coal which fell off the ships during loading operations. After twenty years the river is now being dredged for the first time. Huge pumps lift the mud from the bottom of the Weser to a waste district near Bremen. The population of Bremen gathers the coal out of the mud. The scene reminds of gold rush days - and indeed - to-day coal is more than ever black gold. One person is able to gather approximately 2 to 3 hundred-weights of coal per day. The toiling in mud and water is worth while, the fuel stock at home increases slowly but surely. Fuel out of the sea - coal diggers at the Weser - a glimpse more of the hardships of our time.....and the fight against them.
