

B.E.F. CASUALTIES.

643

At this period of the last war the British and French casualty lists were up in the million mark. Now, owing chiefly to the foresight of France in building their superb Maginot Line, casualties are mercifully few. So few, in fact, that it is scarcely realised that some of the boys are back with war wounds. But here they are; comfortable, in a northern hospital, mending the damage of enemy bullets.

SUMNER WELLES.

The Italian liner Rex, arriving at Naples brought to Italy two special envoys from the United States. First, Mr Sumner Welles, who has been called the "peace explorer" --- that's Mr Welles on the left. The second envoy was Mr Myron Taylor, President Roosevelt's personal ambassador to the Vatican. They were greeted by the American Ambassador in Rome, and Mr Welles later saw Count Ciano, the Italian Foreign Minister, and then went on to ~~Germany~~ Germany. But we shan't be showing you that because they don't like British people taking films in Germany.

FINLAND.

At a time when the Russian offensive in Finland was meeting with its first real success, an exhibition of material captured from the Soviet invader was opened in Helsinki. Hundreds of tanks and aeroplanes --- evidence of the thousands of Russians who have met their doom ~~in~~ at the whim of the dictator. Another exhibit was the parachute mine, and yet another was the new bomb --- a big shell containing hundreds of little incendiary bombs.
