

CHURCHILL.

700

The Prime Minister is a man who likes to see things for himself. Mr Churchill has warned us never to relax our precautions against invasion; here, with Navy and Army Chiefs Sir Dudley Pound and Sir Alan Brooke, he is inspecting coast defences. Britain's great war leader knows that visitors from across the Channel are a ~~par~~ possibility for any time in the future; he wants to be sure that the reception committee will serve up a hot welcome.

The Army is on its toes; our cameramen pierced the defences somewhere in Britain and filmed a record of daily routine.

Mobile units are playing a big part in this war; we found that out to our cost in the Low Countries and France. But when we go in for this war business --- although we may be slow off the mark we always finish up much better at it than the other side.

So much for the army on land. Here is a glimpse of an army that comes out of the sea --- the daily-increasing numbers of Nazi plane crews who get fished out of the water by our rescue boats. They've been shot down while raiding this country. The rest of the war they will spend in a prison camp; ~~where~~ ^{here} they can only be a nuisance to each other.
