

DUKE OF BEDFORD.

816

Something happened in the night to the statue of the fifth Duke of Bedford in Russell Square in London: somebody who didn't like the war views of the present Duke made a protest in this vigorous manner. Apart from his other claims to unpopularity, the Duke has stated that he was unwilling to take down the Russell-Square railings which are needed for munitions.

A.T.S.

Somewhere in Northern Ireland --- an inspection of the A.T.S. Everyday the ranks of Britain's women's services are growing in ~~numbers~~ ^{numbers}; but every day there's room for more. After two years of war these girls have proved their value as auxiliary to the fighting army of the Empire. And it's obvious that a girl doesn't have to look a frump just because she's in uniform.

HOME GUARD.

A big Home Guard Parade at Reigate was inspected by Lieutenant General Paget. They started off as the L.D.V's, armed with a few shot guns an armllet and a ham sandwich; they've grown into a force very much to be reckoned with. But they need recruits to replace younger men called up for the regular services --- so anyone with a few leisure hours a week knows just what to do.
