

PRISONERS.

822

Just another instalment in the serial of Axis fighting men brought captive to Britain. A reminder that although air activity over this country is now on a small scale and although we see little of the Battle of the Atlantic, sea and air war are still showing dividends.

FERRYING SHEEP.

They say we're a seafaring race! this war is proving it to the hilt. In fact we even have ocean-going sheep. All the summer these sheep have been fattening on an island off the Perthshire coast, and now they're being brought back to the mainland on a sort of invasion barge. It's fairly easy to get them aboard, because once you get the first one on the rest follow; but if the head sheep decided to leave in mid-stream presumably they'd all ~~fall~~ ^{scuttle themselves.}

KING AND R.A.F.

The King paid a visit to an air station in Britain where fresh units of the Empire Air Force are in training. His Majesty was naturally impressed by the smartness of all on parade, not excluding some who were not supposed to be there at all. ^{left-right-left-right} In fact, it seemed to be rather a day for gatecrashers --- get back in the ranks!
