A visit to a station of Bomber Command somewhere in the North of Begland --- Mr. Churchill wore his R.A.F. uniform to which he is entitled by his reak of Air Commodore. With him was Dr. Rvatt, the outspoken Australian Minister.

The Premier also made a tour of some of the districts where munitions are being made for the coming offensive. We are now well advenced in the third year of war; and although we started so long behind a Germany in this business of arming for battle, the hum of machinery is rising to a crescendo. We have grumbled at past mistakes and at production deficiencies, but the business of changing over an entire nation from peace to war-production presents superhuman problems: in the light of that --- we haven't done so badly. And one thing we know; there is no better workmanship than British in all the world, and soon we shall see the effect.

In Leeds the Prime Minister had a terrific welcome; and he was a penied by Dr. Frett. Mr. Churchill spoke to the world from this platform, and he ranfined confirmed that feeling of confidence that has been growing in his later speeches. He reminded his audience that none of us is asking any favours of the enemy; that's true; let our fainthearts bear that in mind when the enemy starts asking favours of us.

Finishing the tour, Mr. Churchill inspected an armoured Division; he climbed into one of the Covenanters and rode in it; and he watched a roll past of the Exercise Juggernauts of 1942 battle. We've been taking it from Germany while Germany was strong and we were weak; if we had wanted any quarter from Hitler we should have been darned unlucky; be sure that when the tide of battle turns Hitler's gang will start crying "Kamerad." But we mustn't make the mistake this time that we made in 1918; let's make our resolve right now --- this time we'll stop when we've finished.
