

Glasgow: Lending further flavour to an intense soccer rivalry, the international championship was at stake when England (in white shirts) kicked off against Scotland, at Hampden Park.

On the terraces, young Scots (who've yet to see the "auld enemy" humbled on home soil) are disappointed by some poor finishing.

England attacking now - using the double-centre-forward play to add midfield thrust - but that uncompromising home defence is well on top.

No score at half-time - then Leggat becomes the "darling of the Scots" as he crowns his first international with a goal.

England - who've not lost at Hampden since 1937 - come storming back - and they nearly score. A grand header by Tommy Taylor brings an equally great save from Younger.

Then, with the Hampden roar heralding a Scottish victory - ^{142N. AS} ~~Johnny Haynes~~ levels the scores ~~one-all~~ ^{one-all} in the ~~very~~ ^{final} last minute, by Johnny Haynes, it's the first ever championship tie between all four countries.
