

COLD WAR SPREADS TO THE ARCTIC

An American Naval task force cuts through the storm-whipped North Atlantic. Its destination - Arctic waters. With temperatures well below freezing point, the Arctic gives a chilly welcome to the cold war. Heading into the teeth of a winter gale, the ships find the going tough. To refuel from a fleet tanker under these conditions seems impossible. But somehow, these men bring it off.

Aboard the carrier Siboney, each plane has to be secured against the storm. And when the gale abates, the snow must be cleared from the flight deck by plough, or by elbow grease. The navies of the Western Powers stand guard over the Atlantic Nations' first line of defence - the Arctic.
