

JAPANAUSTRALIANS FOR KOREA

In Japan, men of the Australian 3rd battalion bound for Korea, where Australian fighter-pilots have won high praise, wind up their training.

In the Japanese hills, conditions are like those they will find in Korea. If you watch closely you'll see the bazooka rocket in flight.

That was 9-inch steel armour. The Aussies will go in with the latest and best equipment. Many of them are ex-service volunteers flown up from 'down-under.' Now the tide of war has turned, they're chafing at the bit in case they arrive too late. In Korea, thanks to the Inchon landing, Seoul has fallen and events march as the gigantic pincers trap the Reds. Close in the wake of the huge armada comes General MacArthur, wearing his famous old cap. The almost legendary hero of Pacific island warfare believes in seeing for himself. Says the 70-year-old Commander-in-Chief as he sees Red armour going up in flames, "That's a good sight for my old eyes," and the United Nations echo his praise.
