

JAPANESE EARTHQUAKE

A severe earthquake shook northern Japan, but the toll of dead and injured was amazingly light. A prompt alarm saved many from tumbling buildings and from the huge tidal wave which swept ashore following the quake. In many towns, on the Island of Hokkaido, however, the damage is severe. Over a thousand houses have been destroyed and thousands of the Island's inhabitants have been made homeless in the bitter cold. Though two divisions of troops were in the stricken area, no soldier was injured. Japan digs out from the latest in a long history of catastrophes.
