

Scottish agriculture in all its departments was well represented, as always, At the Royal Highland Show, held this year at Aberdeen. No exhibits north of the border are very more popular than the picturesque Highland Cattle, distinctive as the glens, mountains and mists of the romantic land itself. Scottish farmers are well to the fore in the use of machinery, a fact noted by colourful cattlemen coming over here from Wyoming. They saw latest methods of shifting hay without mechanical farming in Britain would nowadays be impossible.

Accompanied by Lord Forbes, the Princess Royal met some long service workers. James Brown is 88. He's worked 47 years on one farm and hasn't retired yet. A gold medal well earned. Mr. Redford and his son competed in the horseshoe - making competition. This old and honourable craft was widely practised a general ago. Nowadays the skilled farrier is getting to be a rarity.

FLEECE

"FROM FLEECE TO FASHION" says the notice board; hence the presence of some pretty models, where you'd least expect them. They are displaying Scottish woollen wear. But even they couldn't compete with little Boas. She'd only been ten days in the world when she was introduced to a six-month old baby to whom she was given. They didn't quite know what to make of each other at first. A year or so and they'll be the best of friends.
