

BATTLE OF SUOMUSSALMI

The Gazette presents the first pictures of Finland's greatest victory... the utter destruction of the Russian 44th Division. The Finns come out from their shelter for the attack.

They are using Russian Anti Aircraft guns, captured from the enemy ... and now turned against the Russian planes.

The Finns spread out among the forests. The Russians are jammed in mile long columns along the road unable to move forwards or backwards. And then the massacre begins. By comparison the Finn's losses in dead and wounded are minute. One wounded Finn is brought to a field Dressing Station, and now you can see why the Russians found they were fighting an almost invisible army.

One Finn had a bullet through his chest, but the report said he was only slightly hurt. That's the sort of tough soldiers they are. In fact sometimes it's positively pleasant to be wounded.

You know the rest of the story, how the battlefield became one vast heap of Russian machinery and men.

The Finns return to their bases with the spoils of war. Perhaps now the aggressors will think twice before they continue their policy... of the mailed fist over the little nations. Finland has shown them that there are some small nations who would rather die fighting... than give in. In spite of her bombed cities, in spite of her dead mothers and their children, Finland's success has abolished the war of nerves. Whatever else the aggressors want, they'll have to fight for.

Let the little States take heart, the days of the gangster are numbered. The Red Star of Imperialist Russia is laid low, in the white snow of Finland's idealism.
