

Another instalment of the greatest aerial story of all time. A story of the continued heroism of our marvellous Air Force and its partners in determination - the men of the anti-aircraft batteries. Hitler promises to come to Britain in mid August, but on second thoughts decided to send a thousand or so aeroplanes instead. And what a warm welcome they received. British losses, excluding a few balloons, by comparison still maintain in the five to one ratio in our favour.

Hazi five-bomber versus unarmed lightship.

Now the Hun must be gloating - lightship - balloon barrage - if only there were a hospital ship about; But the despicable coward is given no further time for reverie. Retribution comes from out of the blue, and down he goes to join the hundreds who have paid the price of their rashness; and they will go on paying until the full price is paid.

And here's an incident the Hun will never understand. The Spitfire's pilot, having beaten his adversary, directs a patrol boat to the wreck to render aid to the Hazi pilot if not too late.

And the battle ~~xxx~~ of Britain is being fought out in British skies with increasing intensity.

The fiercest aerial battles in history have resulted in Hitler's vaunted air force receiving the soundest thrashing it has ever had. Hundreds of miles of countryside are littered with the smashed and burnt out planes of Hazi Germany.

60/67

Never before has the screen shown such wholesale destruction of an aerial armada, bearing witness to the righteous indignation and fury of our airmen and gunners, at the pollution of our skies and the cowardly attacks on British homes. Wherever the foul sign of the Swastika casts its evil shadow, there will we strike hard in the sacred cause of freedom.
