South Africa's Premier and Commander in Chief is setting off by plane for a visit to the Springboks at the front. A strenuous week of continuous travelling in which his longest period of rest was four hours, is typical of the almost tireless energy of General Smuts. Twenty five years ago he was leading the fathers of these men in a similar campaign. Today he leads another generation and in his own words "They are worthy of the rock from whence they were hewn".

South African women transport ~~xix~~ drivers (known as "Mossies") are doing good work under war conditions, and proving that they can stand up to the test as well as the men. At an advanced Air Force station, General Smuts meets some of the members of democracy's great cavalry of the clouds.

A happy re-union of Father and son. General Jan Smuts and Second Lieutenant Jan Smuts of the Engineering Corps. A soldier among soldiers, Oom Jamie (as he's affectionately called) is proud of what the boys are doing.
