"NORMANDIE" SALVAGED

"Normandie" the crack Trans-Atlantic liner that was fired in New York Harbour early this year, is still being salvaged. The huge vessel is laying on her side in the causeway and an army of workmen are busy on her lofty decks dismantling her metal for scrap. After one experience of fire, there's no smoking on this job. Maybe you'll recall the scenes of the old blaze. The cabins are still yielding their treasures, some of them charred, but none the less treasures. Down below there are other treasures that went down when the ship turned over. Up there part of the deck rail has gone. Still going are the oxy-acetylene cutters, they've a lot of work on hand.
