

0002515

TRANSPORTING WOUNDED.

The job of transporting wounded men is not easy at the best of times, but when there is a cliff face to be negotiated it is very difficult. However, troops in Northern Ireland learn how to sling casualties down without bumping them against the cliff. They only want a snappy lift girl to call "Going Down"! to make everything perfect.

Its quite a different matter when a river has to be crossed. First, a swimmer has to take a line from one bank to the other. This river is ~~ninety~~ ninety two yards across and very deep, so he can't do it with one foot on the bottem. Arriving at the other side his job is to haul across logs fastened to the line he has brought over.

The idea is that these logs are put up in the form of a tripod, matching a similar affair on the opposite bank.

Now a gadget is fixed so that it will run along the taut wire.

In this case an American doughboy volunteered to be taken for a ride.

If he were at home, he'd probably have to pay for the sensation, on one of "Coasters" at Coney Island! Looking up, gives us a strange upside down feeling! If you get what I mean!

Well, that was a pretty comfortable trip; And it just goes to show how easily a casualty can be transported across a river. Our volunteer gets a free cigarette too. He's not sorry he came!