The Duke of Kent visits Lancaster. His Royal Highness has come to perform the opening ceremony of the Corporation's immense new Reservoir. The Duke enters the control tower, and the fountain proves that his services have been successful. The Reservoir will supply over one-hundred-thousand people per year. It's cost was to have been a quarter-of-a-million, but a saving of fifty-thousand has been effected. A declaration is read by the Duke formally opening the Reservoir. He expressed his admiration of the scheme which will not be a burden on the ratepayers.
